	FAQ's Can you sell a song with a leased beat? If your rights are non-exclusive, then the producer can lease or sell the beat to anyone else at any time, thus granting that person the right to release a song that incorporates the very same beat that you're using, subject, of course, to your non-exclusive lease. What if I lease a beat and it blows up? "I leased a beat and the song blew up but some other artist has the exclusive rights." ... Get close with the producer, reach out often and send updates about the song – Show him the potential! Ask if they would consider holding on to the rights (Make sure you have something to offer, other than 'giving credit'.) Can I monetize a leased beat? (only with vocals, not as instrumental) 'Leasing' beats is one of the most common approaches when it comes to beat monetization. To lease your beat means allowing another entity, most commonly another artist, to use your beat in their music and distribute it and monetize it under their name. The artist can distribute his/her 2500 profitable copies over the course of 10 yr term. Can you use a sold beat? Generally, producers then mark the beat as 'SOLD'. Or remove it entirely from their website after it's sold 'exclusively. ... Artists that have licensed the beat before the exclusive rights were sold are still allowed to use the beat for the length of the term in the license.
